PRESIDENT'S CORNER

By: Jim Delane

Spring is almost here and with it comes dive weather. Last month we had Maximum Scuba Shop in Seabrook give us a great presentation on spear fishing. They donated the door prizes and they really went all out. I think the most coveted was the dive computer but people jumped all over the fins and other great stuff. They told us about the spear fishing classes they offer. More important, they have a boat they go offshore and dive the rigs and wrecks with. If you have never dove the rigs, you need to. They go out for a day and it is affordable. You can get their contact info off the website at <http://bayareadivers.org/links.html>. These guys go out whenever they can. Personally, I find the water too cold at this time of year but not this group. If you want to go, they are always ready!

If you are not coming to the meetings then you are missing out on great presentations and door prizes.

This month's general meeting will be Wednesday, Feb 25th. Our guest speaker will be Dennis Camp. He will be telling us about a new dive program which is called the 'Dive Around Texas' Program. This program is sponsored by dive shops, dive equipment manufacturers and dive sites throughout Texas. I don't know the details but I think it has something to do with divers go out, dive different spots and qualify to win gear and stuff from the vendors. Attend the meeting and learn more.

Also, we got the referendum results in and I want to thank the membership for the feedback. We will move forward with making the referendums official. That means that for the next meeting, we will discuss and vote on moving the

Losing ones mask underwater is the most common fear

From a Dive Instructor named Frank

Losing ones mask underwater is the most common fear, and the one most easily over come. Before I started diving, I had the same fear of opening my eyes under water. It was heightened by the fact that I wore contacts at the time (THANK GOD FOR LASICK). But, I had to get over it, and then especially when I started teaching class because, as you can well imagine, I have to demonstrate the techniques thus exposing me to my fears. So, here it goes. You have to promise to try the method and not laugh at me until you give it a whirl.

For one thing, the obvious is to start by opening your eyes in as controlled a setting as you can...in shallow water that you can stand up in. You'll soon find that it is not that big of a deal.

Another very effective method *restrain your laughter* the next time you take a shower, take your mask in with you. While you are in the shower, put the mask on when you are ready, flood it by pulling back on the top of your mask. Once it is flooded....open your eyes, and you will be amazed how much this will work to build your confidence of being able to not only clear your mask without fear, but also to get you used to having your eyes open under water.

Okay, salt water stings, you say. True, but only for a few seconds. When you open your eyes in salt water, it takes a few seconds for the salinity of your eye to balance with the salinity of the water. So, in shallow water, flood your mask, and open your eyes do this a few times.

All of these techniques serve one primary function: To teach your body, and your natural instincts, that you ARE capable of doing what you don't think you can do. It is really true that the human body is an amazing thing, and you can adjust to a great many things by the power of your will to do so. The next time you get afraid of any skill, whether it be clearing your mask, sucking in water, or whatever, just remember that you can train your body to accept this as normal, and that you have the ability to move on and fix it. You do. Just think about the guys that walk over a bed of nails, or who "swallow" fire, or any number of crazy stunts we do with our body.

Coral Reinterpreted Jewelry Collection Set to Launch

Jewelry Pieces Will Be Auctioned Online To Benefit Increased Coral Protection

NEW YORK, Feb. 19 /PRNewswire/ -- Beginning February 26, 2009, designers will be offering coral alternatives that are perfect gifts for those that love the ocean. To help raise awareness of the threats corals face and the need for immediate action to protect these vulnerable marine animals, renowned designers Hannah Garrison of AZU, Frank Gehry, Kimberly McDonald, Melissa Joy Manning, Jennifer Meyer, Monique Pean, Paloma Picasso, Jean Schlumberger and Vena Cava's Sophie Buhai and Lisa Mayock have united with SeaWeb's Too Precious to Wear campaign to launch a one-of-a-kind jewelry collection titled Coral Reinterpreted.

Each designer has created or donated a single piece of wearable art that evokes the feel of the ocean without harming living animals, such as corals. Pieces from the collection will be worn by models at David Peck's Untitled 11:11 show 'Into the Woods,' as well as by key influencer Olivia Chantecaille during New York Fashion Week.

The pieces will be auctioned online to benefit increased protection of precious corals. Bids may be placed online from February 26 to April 30, 2009 via www.tooprecioustowear.org.

Too Precious to Wear is a SeaWeb campaign made possible with support from The Tiffany & Co. Foundation, Kingfisher Foundation, National Marine Sanctuary Foundation and The Ocean Foundation. www.tooprecioustowear.org

Success for Gulf Sea Turtles

The Gulf of Mexico Fishery Management Council yesterday supported action that Oceana had proposed to protect threatened sea turtles when they voted to take immediate action to protect sea turtles from the bottom longline sector of the Gulf of Mexico reef fish fishery. Specifically, the council initiated an emergency rule prohibiting longline gear in waters shallower than 50 fathoms for a six month period to protect sea turtles while the National Marine Fisheries Service (NMFS) develops a long-term solution.

COCONUT CRABS

Sent in by Fred Swerdlin

The coconut crab, Birgus latro, is the largest land-living arthropod in the world. It is a highly apomorphic hermit crab and is known for its ability to crack coconuts with its strong pincers in order to eat the contents. It is the only species of the genus Birgus.

It is also called the robber crab or palm thief, because some coconut crabs are rumored to steal shiny items such as pots and silverware from houses and tents.<sup>[1]</sup> Another name is "terrestrial hermit crab", due to the use of shells by the young animals; however, there are other terrestrial hermit crabs which do not get rid of the shell even as adults. These - typically in the closely related genus Coenobita - are the animals usually called "terrestrial hermit crab"; given the close relationship between Coenobita and Birgus the term would generally refer to any member of the Coenobitidae.

The coconut crab also has a range of local names. For example ayuyu on Guam, and unga or kaveu in the Cook Islands. On Guam, it is sometimes referred to as a "taotaomo'na coconut crab" because of the traditional belief that ancestral spirits can return in the form of animals such as the ayuyu (coconut crab).

It's not really a crab, first off. It's like a really, really big hermit crab, which isn't really a crab either. Hermit crabs are always outgrowing their shells and looking for new ones. Coconut crabs are so big; they've given up looking for shells that will fit. Actually, a football helmet would be just about the right size.

The coconut crab has gills but they are modified to function as lungs. It spawns in the ocean and the young pass through their larval stage there. During the postlarval stage, the young inhabit abandoned shells.

They eat coconuts for a living! How would you like to be on an island and come across a crab that is more than 3 feet from head to tail and weighs up to 40 pounds, with a pair of large pincers strong enough to open coconuts! They can climb trees too, but they only eat coconuts that have already fallen to the ground. Coconut crab meat has been considered a local delicacy.

To quote a line from a movie, "You got a pot"

She said spawning

Filed by: Peter Etnoyer

I'm really enjoying The Oyster's Garter these days. Miriam Goldstein keeps me updated with important nature stories like "When sponges ruled the Earth" 635 million years ago in the Early Cambrian epoch, just before the Cambrian explosion.

Since more than 90% of modern sponges resemble those ancient sponges, perhaps there's something to be said for a simple life of filtering seawater and spawning.

Heh heh. She said spawning. I like Miriam's tricks. Her word clicks through to a spawning Xestospongia. Nice. The image is a classic I've never seen before. Awesome. Candy mint for you, MG. Your poetry is inspiration.

Xestospongia muta is a big time spawner on Flower Garden Banks National Marine Sanctuary (FGBNMS) at the upper edge of the twilight zone (~130') in the Gulf of Mexico. This video below is courtesy FGB Diver, from September of 2006. It shows female, then male colonies spawning. FGBNMS staff regularly monitor annual spawning events. This is the deepest recorded spawning activity on the Flower Garden Banks to date.

I remember this dive rather vividly. We swam in scuba gear away from the boat as far as possible before catching our breath, then descended along the flank of the bank to ~120 feet to a scene resembling a forest fire, underwater. The "smoke" on the horizon was actually sponge spawn. We'd swam into a deep water love scene.

FGB Diver and I just thought we would share this fond memory of deep spawning event in a spongorific display of link love to the Oyster's Garter.
